Q: Set The environment variable for a linux command executed from a bat file I want to create a bat file that will be executed on linux. The command that needs to be executed is: echo "1" > abc.txt So what I need to set in the bat file is the environment variable, so the command will be executed using the cmd.exe that is already on the system instead of using my local cmd. I will explain, if I run the command from the CLI, I can use the set command: set and execute the command: echo 1 > abc.txt However, if I run the bat file, the process that I execute is not the CLI, but it is the LOCAL CLI, so I cannot use the set command, as I was unable to set the environment variable. Please tell me what to do. Thanks A: You could use doskey to do this from a batch file: doskey echo "1" > abc.txt To set the SHELL environment variable for this batch file use: set SHELL=c:\windows\syswow64\cmd.exe A: Solved it. The bat file was: echo "1" > abc.txt The environment variable needed to be set was: SHELL=c:\windows\syswow64\cmd.exe Thanks for the help Head of the Wisconsin Department of Health Services Alegent Health plans to give the state's largest health insurance provider a business boost by teaming up with a new nonprofit to offer health care at no cost to the uninsured. The new nonprofit, Health First Wisconsin, will build on the success of the state's first-in-the-nation Medical Assistance Program, which launched in 2003. More than 90,000 state residents enrolled in Health First program last year at a cost of $103 million. Officials say it was the most successful health care program in the nation and helped improve health outcomes for the uninsured. Alegent Health, the parent company of Madison-based Alegent Health Medical Center, is the state's largest provider of health care, offering services in eight counties in west central Wisconsin. Alegent has a long history of helping low-income patients access health care.

What's New In?

A bug that turns apps into paperweights and makes others uninhabitable could be on the way out, Apple says. The Cupertino, Calif.-based company's latest iOS update is out and includes a security update that eliminates a file-sharing vulnerability. The software update -- dubbed "iOS 9.3.2" -- contains the fixes, and it's available right away. The update includes a bunch of fixes for a handful of apps and security issues. If you use the Find My Friends app to check in with your ex, you'll notice that information is no longer in the app. The update also includes security fixes for some banking apps, and it's important that you grab the update. Let's talk about that vulnerability now. When you have Bluetooth enabled on your iOS device, you might realize that when you pair your phone with a car, it draws an extra charge from the battery. If the problem gets worse, then you need to run the battery down. That's because Bluetooth communicates over the air -- or by using radio waves to transmit data. The vulnerability exists in the way iOS handles these transmissions. In a blog post on Monday, Apple said that some devices -- the most recent example was the iPad Pro -- can still send a limited number of packets before they start to drop the connection. The company said that the vulnerability can be exploited by connecting to a malicious server. In order to exploit the bug, the attacker needs to know the user's PIN or password, and can send it to the victim's device. That could allow someone to impersonate an authorized user and cause your device to drop communications. The bug also allows someone to take advantage of a Bluetooth-enabled accessory and use your device as part of a cyberattack on your car. Apple said the update is available for iPhone 5s and later devices, iPad Air and later, the sixth-generation iPod touch, and the seventh-generation iPod touch. The update has also been made available for the iPad 2 and third-generation iPod touch. In order to verify that your iOS device has been updated, you need to open the Settings app. Select General --> Software Update. pass def _option_to_string(option): "" Converts a command option to a string. "" if option == "": return ""
